The National League of Cities' Mayors' Education Task Force has invited Dayton Mayor Jeffrey J. Mims, Jr., to chair the organization for a two-year term, through November of 2024.

The Task Force works to promote partnerships between city leadership, school districts, teacher unions, community and faith-based organizations, and business leaders to create local solutions that improve outcomes for the children and youth in their cities.

The Task Force meets bi-annually at NLC events, in March at the Congressional City Conference and in November at the City Summit (Kansas City, Nov. 17-19). These meetings provide mayors a dedicated forum to advance education agendas and strategies through constructive conversations.

Mayor Mims was invited to serve as chair as a result of his education leadership and passion for providing equitable education opportunities for youth.

"I am honored to accept this appointment as the new chair of National League of Cities' Mayors' Education Task Force," said Mayor Mims. "As a lifelong educator, I look forward to bringing my experience and passion for education to this national leadership role. Along with mayors from around the country, we will uplift the critical work of improving educational opportunities for youth in our cities."
